Antioche ou le monde à l'envers: Gloire et dénouement dans Crisante de Jean Rotrou

Hélène d'Oreye

Abstract. Jean Rotrou's little known play Crisante was long seen as merely one tragedy among many. It can be read, however, not simply as a tragedy but as a parody of the tragic genre. Through his use of plot lines and characterizations, Rotrou consciously raises questions about the theatrical aesthetics of his day, particularly about the form that the ending of a tragedy should take.

Voyeuristic Representations of Displaced Desire in Claire Denis' Beau travail

Julie D. Hendrix

25

Abstract. Claire Denis's film Beau travail depicts repression and unfulfilled desire in a world characterized by rigidity. Through the voiceover narration from Galoup's diary we learn about his past and the events that led to his discharge from the French Foreign Legion; the distance between present narration and past events reinforces our sense of his repression. This creates a voyeuristic quality in the film, which suggests both his sexual desire and the alienation that leads to his frustration.

Silence and the Unsayable in Lorca's Doña Rosita la soltera

Daniel R. Walker

33

Abstract. Although not as well known as the tragic cycle consisting of Bodas de sangre, Yerma, and La casa de Bernarda Alba, Federico García Lorca's Doña Rosita la soltera o El lenguaje de las flores (1935) is much more than a curious artifact of a bygone era. Through the tale of the spinster Rosita, who tries to remain at the margins of the claustrophobic social circles of Granada, Lorca creates a world enveloped by silence. In this world, silence—in its diverse manifestations—is not the absence of language but rather an integral part of it.

La ambivalente expresión de lo urbano en la vanguardia española
María Ángeles Sáiz Angulo 47

Abstract. A rejection of the traditions of the past explains the modernist artist's attraction to elements of the new. Spanish avant-garde writers like Pedro Salinas and Benjamin Jarnés depict the city—the seat of technology, speed, cinema, and fashion—as a vital and dynamic space that allows them to offer a new, fragmented view of the world. At the same time, the dehumanizing effect of capitalism reflected in the metropolis evokes disillusionment in the works of Federico García Lorca and Francisco Ayala.

Guilt, Innocence, and Power in La sonrisa inacabada and Las falenas by Àngels Aymar

Barbara Foley Buedel 67

Abstract. Àngels Aymar's plays La sonrisa inacabada (2002) and Las falenas (2003) present variations on the notion of power. La sonrisa inacabada depicts the consequences of powerful events, specifically family rupture, exile, and loss. Las falenas explores the remorse of seven former co-workers who twenty years ago were manipulated by El Hombre into committing unethical, immoral, or illegal acts. As is evident in these plays, Aymar's theater is characterized by a number of common themes, as well as by experimentation with language.

Conquistador al borde un ataque de nervios: Las crónicas de Tristán de Luna en la Florida, Alabama, Georgia y Tennessee (1559-1561)

Charles B. Moore 85

Abstract. Madness played a part in the failure of the expedition of Tristán de Luna in Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee in 1559-61. The heroic myth of the invincible conquistador in colonial America had been propagated by Cortés in Mexico; however, as Cortés and other conquistadores lost or failed to realize the glory and fame of their dreams, the myth was eroded. Disappointment turned to frustration and then to madness as hopes of greatness evaporated, and Luna was no exception to this rule.

La homosexualidad y la función seductora en El beso de la mujer araña de Manuel Puig

Hosun Kim 99

Abstract. In Manuel Puig's El beso de la mujer araña, homosexuality can be seen not as a sexual preference in the traditional sense, but rather as a cultural model of sensibility based on seduction through the power of discourse. In this sense, homosexuality functions as a mediator of cultural differences.

La isla y el juego como agentes reveladores del otro oculto en El juego del Apocalipsis: un viaje a Patmos de Jorge Volpi

Rosana L. Díaz 115

Abstract. The metaphoric displacement to an island and the dynamic of a game become the catalysts that lead to the discovery of the repressed self in El juego del Apocalipsis by Jorge Volpi. Through apocalyptic language, a sinister game, and a sacred journey, the novel establishes a parallel between the end of the world and the horror that lies within the self, creating an irreversible psychological, emotional, and moral collapse.

La Patagonia vacía, eterna y absoluta como final de novela

Silvia Casini 125

Abstract. Contemporary novels about Patagonia rely on foundational texts to caricature the region as sterile, empty, and isolated. In Mempo Giardinelli's Final de novela en Patagonia (2000), descriptions are influenced by the stereotypes of the foundational texts for two reasons: the narrator is not from Patagonia, and the clichés are convenient for artistic purposes.

Visión postmoderna en Las andariegas de Albalucía Ángel

Sangsuk Kim 139

Abstract. Part of the recent shift away from the dominant values of Western European culture has been a shift from the patriarchal subject to pluralistic feminine values. Such a shift is evident in the work of the Colombian writer Albalucía Ángel, who, challenging the masculine Weltanschauung of a silenced reality, subverts established images and constructs a new history of Woman in Las andariegas (1984).

Certaines œuvres appellent à la révolution du regard. Cet appel est parfois aisément perceptible. Dans d'autres œuvres, l'invite est plus discrète et ne se laisse entendre qu'au second degré. C'est le cas dans Crisante, tragédie de Jean Rotrou délaissée de la critique.¹ Paradoxalement, Crisante est pourtant tout, sauf discrète : c'est au contraire une tragédie pleine de mouvement, de passions exacerbées et de violence. Je montrerai ici que Crisante est une œuvre qui autorise plusieurs niveaux de lecture et qui, subrepticement, agit à contre-pied de ce qu'elle paraît illustrer. On verra aussi que le renversement de perspective qu'elle induit porte essentiellement sur le plan de l'esthétique.

Crisante a été créée durant les années 1630, probablement en 1635. Elle se situe donc à un tournant dans l'histoire de la tragédie française : au moment où celle-ci se renouvelle et repart avec succès, face à une tragi-comédie triomphante. « Moderne » par plusieurs traits de sa dramaturgie,² Crisante est pourtant d'une esthétique différente de celle qui va se mettre en place au cours des années qui viennent et que nous appelons aujourd'hui « classique ». C'est une pièce qui vise, non à la vraisemblance, mais au spectaculaire par les effets de scène qu'elle met au service de la représentation des passions (Rotrou, Théâtre complet 4: 9; 28-31). Ainsi, le spectateur assiste-t-il à un meurtre, une crise de folie et trois suicides sur scène ; il a droit en outre, en coulisses, à un viol et à une décapitation de cadavre ; sans compter les évanouissements, les jeux de poignards et d'épées, ainsi qu'une tête coupée brandie par l'héroïne. Cette exhibition de violence, qui sera bientôt proscrite de la tragédie, était pourtant loin d'être exceptionnelle dans le théâtre du début du XVII^e siècle.³ Comme aujourd'hui, elle avait ses raisons d'être commerciales et devait correspondre à certaines attentes du public. Mais, bien que Rotrou se serve des ficelles que lui donnait son expérience
